

KEEP YOUR MOMENTUM

Too often we act like consistency is a bad thing. We whine about being bored with the same thing all the time. We excuse our stupid decisions because “variety is the spice of life.” Listen, variety may spice up your social life, but it’ll spoil your financial life. It’s easy to ignore the powerful force of consistency because it often fades into the background. However, consistency builds momentum. And we like consistency. We like not having to map out and meticulously plan our daily drive to work. We like being around and trusting the same people we’ve known for twenty years. We like having our paychecks hit our bank accounts like clockwork twice a month. We like being able to count on our coworkers who have proven themselves in the past. You know what we don’t like? When things get out of whack. When we expect one thing and get another. When “variety” pops up and slows down the momentum we’ve been building. Consistency may feel boring sometimes, but when something’s working, why would you want to switch gears?
