

This is an area many millionaire couples have to work on throughout their marriage. It's easy for one spouse to get excited about the prospect of spending some money, but their partner may not be ready to flex those spending muscles yet. That makes sense. If you live a frugal life for forty years, the thought of dropping $30,000 on home renovations may scare you to death. I coached a couple through that exact situation a few years ago. The wife wanted to do a massive renovation, but her husband freaked out at the thought of dropping so much money into the project. He wasn't there yet. So, I helped them come up with a solution. I suggested they tackle the projects one room at a time. That way, they only had to spend $5,000 or so each month, and they could see instant results. That took the pressure off him, she was able to enjoy their wealth, and their home got a beautiful makeover over the course of several months. It was a win-win, but it took a little effort to get everyone on the same page. That's effort well spent, though. As we saw in the previous chapter, millionaires prioritize their marriages and relationships. Don't work together to build wealth only to let that wealth tear you apart in the end. Keep working together and enjoy the new lifestyle you chose for yourselves.
