

Moving In Together

Before you move in together, inform your partner of any skeletons in your financial closet, such as bad credit, a past bankruptcy, a lien on your house, unpaid child support, or a tax lien. Since you'll be mingling finances to some extent, it's only fair to be up front about these things. It's likely your partner will find out about any financial issues once you're living together anyway. You can always change the way you do things after you've lived together for a while, but don't wait until then to discuss how you're going to handle the money issues that affect you both, from spending habits to investments and financial goals.

ESSENTIAL

The Myvesta Foundation offers a brochure called Living Together: A Financial Contract for Unmarried Couples. It's available from their website at www.myvesta.org/articles.
