

For a will to become legal, it should be typed or computer-generated. Handwritten wills are legally binding in only twenty-five states and those states have different requirements about signing the pages and other issues. Your will must state that it's your will and it must be signed and dated. At least two (in some states three) people who won't inherit anything under the will must witness your signature and sign their names to the will. The witnesses must watch you sign and you must watch them sign. They don't need to read the will or know what's in it.
