

3 Tips for Cutting Out Cable TV without Missing Your Favorite Shows

Think your cable bill isn't that big a deal? Think of it this way: "It's like buying a new 50" TV each year and tossing it in the dumpster," asserts CancelCable.com.

Fortunately, it's now easier than ever to enjoy a good picture and a wide range of programming without paying the cable company. Here are the changes and services that are allowing more and more people to cut the cable.

1. Free news streaming

Check out network TV websites like CBS.com, NBC.com, and ABC.com. And don't make me remind you about the library, people!

The one thing we miss most by not having cable at our house? The Daily Show, of course. So years back we made it a little night-night routine to watch The Daily Show on my laptop via Hulu.com in bed (though this particular show is no longer available on Hulu). Yeah, it's yesterday's episode, but is getting the same episode 24 hours earlier worth nearly $160 a month? Not to me.

And since I'm busy tomorrow night during the season premiere of Grey's Anatomy, I'll be watching it Friday—on ABC.com.

2. Low cost programming

Netflix and Hulu make me wonder why anyone has cable.

With Netflix, for example, anytime we feel like vegging out in front of the tube, we usually have something we're interested in sitting
