
5. Let your boss pay for it

An increasing number of workplaces offer tuition reimbursement programs and will pick up the tab for up to a certain number of credit hours a year. Some employer plans require that you maintain a satisfactory grade level (C average or higher) and that you work a minimum number of hours. In addition, you may have to pay up-front costs, which will then be reimbursed by your place of employment.

6. Go in the off-season

It may be possible to get a 50% discount on your college courses if you're willing to attend during unpopular class times. Early morning, late evening, and holiday class offerings are often more difficult to fill. Some colleges will reduce the price for these classes to ensure adequate enrollment.

In addition to the traditional methods of scholarships, grants, loan forgiveness, and work-study, there are less traditional methods of saving college money. Tailor a unique schedule or program at your school, and it is possible to pay far less. By being as flexible as possible, you just might avoid the highest price tag on today's college education. — Linsey Knerl

7 Great Jobs That Offer College Loan Forgiveness

Paying for a college education can last up to 20 years post-graduation. While the cost is usually justified through higher earnings, it can still be burdensome. These seven careers are not only growing in opportunity, but they can sometimes offer partial to complete loan forgiveness!

1. Teaching

There are many arguments as to whether teachers get paid enough these days. If you could add in up to $17,500 in student loan forgiveness, however, it can make this high-demand career more appealing. Teachers that work in designated "low income" school districts for a minimum of five years can see some of that college debt wiped away. More debt forgiveness is offered to those teachers with an emphasis in math, science, and special education. (Visit StudentAid.ed.gov for full details of current programs.)
