

together and would make sure we could bring a friend; since there are lecherous professors out there, bringing a friend helps keep everything on the up and up and you get a free meal and possibly wine or beer too.

2. Art show openings

You are in a college town! There are bound to be a few art show openings. Find out when they are and attend. Many times galleries in an area will team up and have a bunch of openings on the same night. This way you can walk a few blocks and hit wine, bottled water, cheese, fruit, and veggies dipped in dressing at a few places so you won't look like you are hovering over the food necessarily.

3. Collect recycling

Honestly. One of my college apartments was next to a grocery store and I saved all my family's recycling to put in the machine out front which would spit out coupons to use in the grocery store. Even today when my husband and I take in recycling we sometimes collect about $9–$11 dollars' worth of free groceries for our troubles.

4. Bake sales

Work that bake sale for that cause you kind of care about. There will be leftovers, and if you sample beforehand, you can make recommendations.

5. Raid meetings

Check out conferences and meetings on campus. Nine times out of 10 your college will put out a little catered spread at various functions on campus for people who are attending to have a snack. Dress a little nicer than usual.

6. Realtor open houses

Hungry on Saturday and campus options all closed? Head into the community. Granted, the food will be similar to the art openings, but beggars can't be choosers and it'll at least be fresh. Dress nicely, talk about being pre-law or pre-med and how that house will make a great starter home.

7. Befriend someone in culinary school

They work in some pretty nice kitchens, and that'll be a great switch from eating wine, cheese, and grapes from the open houses and art shows. My sister befriended and dated a lot of culinary academy students. In the first four years she lived in San Francisco I don't think she ever paid for a meal. Ever. In every kitchen in town she
