8. Flirt

You can always scrounge up a few pennies for coffee at a coffee shop. Go in late at night. Be kind to the waiter or waitress. Smile. You might see a free piece of pie. I am forever grateful to the guys at The Apple Pan in Los Angeles down the road from UCLA. Thanks for feeding me!

9. Work it

Think about getting a part-time café job. You can survive well on just about day-old anything. Your café won't be able to sell those day-old bagels or quiche, but there isn't anything wrong with them.

10. Get help

Tell your grandparents to buy you gift cards to grocery stores that are near your school or to put money on your meal card for the next semester. They don't know what to buy you for your birthday anymore—this is a great solution for them to help with college and for you not to have to wear that ugly sweater they were going to buy you.

Just look at all those solutions; you didn't even have to dumpster dive! Mom and Dad would be so proud of you. —Maggie Wells

9 Ways to Homeschool for Less

In a cost-study I completed, I found that it is possible for American families to spend between $300 and $4,325 per year to homeschool a single child. While this is as varied a figure as the child it represents, there are some very simple, smart ways to keep your costs on the low side. Here are my top picks for keeping curriculum expenses low and how each has worked for our family.
