

with you. They need to assess your entire financial situation, which can't be done effectively if you are shuffled in and out the door in record time.

2. What will you do?

The best answer you can get is for them to say they'll examine your situation, and only if it is appropriate, they can arrange a Debt Management Plan suited to your situation. Sometimes after a consultation, they will advise you to tackle your debts on your own because they're not bad enough yet, or conversely will advise you to see a bankruptcy attorney.

3. What kind of debt can you help me with?

You don't want a counselor who will just address your credit card debt if your student loans, mortgage, and other debts are also eating away at your finances.

4. How much will this cost?

Ideally you should not pay more than $75 up front, and no more than $55/month ongoing.

Don't be too embarrassed about your financial situation to see somebody who can help you. The best way to move forward with your life is to take ownership of your current predicament and make the right moves toward financial freedom. It is still possible. — Nora Dunn
