

Ice cube trays can be used to save you loads of time and money in the kitchen. Numerous liquids and sauces can be frozen in them, and then stored in gallon freezer bags for future use. Some ideas?

1. Tomato sauce or paste

You can usually find the large cans of tomato sauce at warehouse stores for around the $3 range. This is much less expensive than the small cans from the grocery store. Freezing the leftover sauce saves you from having a half empty can of sauce sitting in your fridge going to waste. Toss the frozen sauce in with your soup broth, or add a few sauce cubes in the frying pan for taco night.

2. Leftover coffee

Frozen coffee cubes work great to make your own gourmet frozen coffee drinks. I like to have some coffee in a pitcher in the fridge as well. That way, when I add the liquid element to the frozen cubes in the blender it doesn't dilute the strength of the beverage.

3. Soup stock

Whether you freeze beef, chicken, or vegetable stock in the ice trays, it'll make your life easier when preparing recipes that only call for a small amount of stock.

4. Leftover gravy

This makes a great base for pot pies, or as a substitute soup broth item.

5. Applesauce

Since this stuff also comes cheap in the large jars at warehouse stores, the frozen cubes are great for those who bake often and want to control fat content.

6. Fresh herbs

If you have some fresh herbs from the produce section that are about to go bad, chop them up and put them in the cube sections with a bit of water. The frozen cubes are great to add to soups. This is also a way to preserve extra items from your herb garden at the end of the season.

7. Purees and baby food

If you make your own versions of these, it's a great way to have access to only the smaller amounts, which is what you usually need with these items.

STORAGE AND USAGE TIPS

To stay organized with this system and avoid freezer burn from open