Everything You Need to Know about Unclaimed Property

Unclaimed property consists of cash and other personal assets that are considered lost or abandoned after an owner cannot be located within a specified period of time. This property may be cash, bonds, stocks, gift certificates, and contents of safety deposit boxes (jewelry, documents, etc). The amazing thing about unclaimed property is that it's just that—unclaimed. It still belongs to the rightful owner, and by law, all they need to do is ask for it to regain possession. But how does one go about finding out about it in the first place?

WHERE TO LOOK?

Most state treasuries in the United States each maintain their own websites, where users can look up any unclaimed funds by last name. The trouble with this method is that you need to go to a separate site for each state you may have property in. And who wants to Google-search for many different states that may potentially hold an unclaimed treasure? websites
