

10 Things to Do with Bargain Beef

Steaks and roasts can often go on sale for less than the cost of lean hamburger. Ask the meat department to grind, slice, or chop it for you. They've always been happy to do it for me free of charge. Here are 10 ways to stretch the beef you bought for a bargain.

1. Teriyaki strips

This is most easily done with the larger, thicker steaks. If you slice them on a diagonal, it will leave you with a thin wide strip easily woven onto a wooden skewer. Soak it in your favorite teriyaki marinade (homemade or otherwise) and grill it for dinner along with some brown rice and a vegetable side. Bonus? They cook in a flash!

2. Kabobs

.....

I really like making these with beef as well as chicken. Some of my favorite vegetables to include are green and red peppers, onions, and mushrooms. One great thing about grilled kabobs for dinner is having the meat and vegetable portion of the meal taken care of ahead of time. I only have to start the rice cooker when I get home from running errands.

3. Beef-fry

.....

The key to a quick dinner prep with this stir-fry is to have the beef cut small enough to not take a whole lot longer than the vegetables. You can certainly add a sauce if you want, but I like the simple flavors of the ingredients in a bit of olive oil and a little low-sodium soy sauce.

4. Stew

.....

Use whatever you have on hand as a penny-pinching strategy or implement your favorite family recipe. I've done this with browned ground beef or steak tips. Personally, I like a tomato-based broth for my beef soups and stews, but do what works best for you.
