

5. Stroganoff

This can also be done with either chopped beef pieces or ground beef. Some people may not consider this a penny-pinching idea due to the use of sour cream in the recipe. However, if you want to do something a little more elaborate for dinner without dishing out major bucks, this may be a moderate solution that fits your situation.

6. Steak and cheese quesadillas

Tortillas, cheese, leftover steak pieces, and salsa. It doesn't get much easier than this. If flipping the entire round version sends you into dimensions of ticked-off you never knew existed, try only filling half of a single tortilla and folding the other half over the top. This way you only have half the size to flip and one of the sides is closed, making it easier not to spill the contents on the frying pan.

7. Sloppy Joes

You pretty much need ground beef for these. Not the fanciest dinner idea in town, but certainly fun to eat with some veggie sticks or a salad side.

8. Pizza topping

Whether you want to go with the traditional hamburger pizza, or try steak pieces with BBQ sauce, this is a great way to stretch beef into a fun meal that will feed several people.

9. Spaghetti sauce

Again, ground beef will be necessary here. Try making a large batch and freezing it into meal-sized portions suitable for the number of people in your family. That way, you can dump some in the Crock-Pot once a week and have dinner nearly ready when you get home. Just boil the pasta!

10. French dip sandwiches

These are the kind you see on the menu of a lot of family-style restaurants. Basically, it's a warm toasted sliced-beef sandwich with a side of French onion soup to dip into. A cheese-steak sandwich would be equally doable. — Myscha Theriault
