

16 Ways to Go Light and Low-Budget

With all the talk of airlines starting to charge for the very first bag you check, “one-bag” travel (or the pursuit of it) is going to become a larger priority for many. This is easier to achieve on some trips than others. Indicators are the length, diversity, and independence level of the trip. For your average three- to seven-day adventure however, affordable “one-bag” travel is definitely doable.

1. Limit the footwear

If you’re going to a specific region and planning on mainly a sightseeing mission, one pair of sensible adventure shoes can get the job done. KEEN sandals for both men and women are good picks. They are available in either washable leather or various colors of quick-dry webbing. And while it might not be my favorite fashion statement, you can squeeze a pair of socks under them on a chilly day.

If you have multiple agendas or obligations on your journey, downsizing to a single pair of shoes can be a real challenge. Sticking to just two pairs, however, is achievable with a little forethought. And, if you make sure one set is as flat and flexible as possible, they shouldn’t cut into your space allotment too much.

2. Go miniature where possible

This won’t work for everything, but many items are perfectly functional in miniature form. Head lamps and nail clippers are a couple that come to mind. Sea to Summit’s travel line is one of my personal high-performance favorites.

3. Follow the container principle

Having small and like items in separate containers or organizer bags keeps you from feeling like you are reaching into a chaotic bag of doom every time you need to find a particular item. In addition to being a huge fan of the personal organizers for toiletries from L.L.Bean, I also like Ziplocs, Space Bags, and packing cubes.

4. Go as thin as possible on layers

Bringing several lighter layers enables you to have more wardrobe options, be cool or warm as needed, and not take up too much space in
