
10. Slip into something new

Consider wearing some of the more traditional underclothes that have fallen out of fashion as of late—slips, body shapers, and undershirts will both help your clothing drape better over your body, and also protect clothing from sweat stains and friction that can cause wear and tear. I once spent $70 on a body slimmer by Spanx (I used to buy the cheaper ones called Assets), and not only do I look slimmer, but the darn thing actually helps improve my posture. Also, it keeps my wobbly thighs firmly encased in fabric, which means that the insides of my pants don't wear as quickly because my thighs don't rub against them as much.

You obviously don't have to spend nearly as much for a cotton undershirt or a silk slip, but these things keep clothing away from your skin, and it doesn't matter if they get stained, since no one else is going to see them. Undershirts, slips, and camisoles can help your clothing last longer.

11. Notice your surroundings

Those Aeron chairs, while comfortable, really rub the seat of your pants the wrong way. If you are noticing increased wear on your clothing, look around to see what part of your work or home environment could be contributing to it. The edge of your desk might be wearing down your shirt cuffs. Look for small ways to improve your position so that your clothing isn't taking a beating while you are working.

12. Clean/polish shoes

Polishing may seem a bit tedious, but frequently wiping down your shoes with a barely damp cloth will prevent dirt from settling into cracks permanently, and will keep leather from getting too dry (which causes cracking).

13. Don't drive in dress shoes

I've ruined many a pair of dress pumps by doing nothing more than driving; the back of the heel rubs against my car's floor mats, and before long, my black shoes are spotting fuzzy gray patches on the back where the carpet did its work. I'm not high-class enough to wear driving moccasins, so I just wear sandals or Crocs in the car and put my shoes on once I arrive at the office.

14. Patch early, patch often

Blue jeans are usually the first items of clothing to develop little holes
