

3. Body ointment for those extra-dry spots

This is dirt cheap and works really well. Buy the cheapest generic brand of vegetable shortening you can find. Melt it slowly in a mini Crock-Pot or double boiler. Pour into a small, heat-resistant airtight container and add a few drops of essential oil. (I like using peppermint oil in this ointment because it has a soothing yet zingy feel when you use the balm.) Close the container and allow to resolidify.

Use as a night balm on lips, elbows, heels, and knees. This ointment is dirt cheap, works really well, and has no unidentified ingredients.

4. After-shower body oil

You can skip the regular stuff with all the petroleum additives and just use olive or soy oil with your favorite scented oil. Olive oil blends work great. Women in the Mediterranean have been using olive oil on their skin for a very long time.

5. Salt and sugar scrubs

I usually make salt scrubs. They feel the same to me, and bulk salt costs a fair amount less, which enables me to enjoy even more of this stuff! Pick a great essential oil scent or a fun combo like orange and cinnamon or grapefruit and sage. Put a few drops of the scented stuff into a larger amount of soy oil, which is available in bulk at warehouse stores for pretty cheap. Mix in either salt or sugar until you have the desired consistency. Scoop into airtight containers and set aside for use. What is great about these scrubs is that you can exfoliate and get a moisture seal at the same time.

6. Make your shampoo a multipurpose item

Here are some additional things I use shampoo for: shower gel, facial cleanser, light stain remover, substitute sudsing item in homemade spray cleaners, and as a laundering agent for hand-washable delicates.

7. Everlasting hair spray

Okay, it doesn't last forever this way, but it lasts much longer. The only trick is you need the pump-bottle
