

days, we believed that sex cleared up acne. Although there doesn't appear to be any direct correlation between sexual activity and zits, people who have regular, satisfying sex tend to have a glow about them.

Sex gets your blood flowing. Orgasms reduce stress and increase pain tolerance due to a natural boost in oxytocin and endorphin levels. Sexual satisfaction also helps you sleep better at night. In short, orgasms are good for your brain, and when your brain is happy, the rest of your body will respond in kind. Your mood, sense of self, and general well-being will be affected, and others will notice.

2. Exercise

This is another activity that gets your endorphins flowing. Something about that bordering-on-Zen feeling that follows a vigorous workout is really lovely. Sweating clears out your pores and helps to prevent acne. Even though I personally regard the gym as a chamber of torture, I find that I look like a million bucks about an hour after huffing and puffing through a weight routine, or 30 minutes of tripping over the elliptical machine.

But it's not like you have to push yourself to the limit to get benefits from exercise. A short routine of yoga will get your blood pumping, as will a long, meandering walk around a park or city street.

Our bodies are made to be active, and by doing so, we're sending the right signals to our muscles and cells to keep up the good work, and maintain health.

3. Laugh

You'd never know it from the popular media, but smiling is such a simple way to immediately look better. We spend so much of our days grimacing at the computer screen, or glowering at the line in the post office, that it can be tough to bring ourselves to smile in a genuine, open manner.

When was the last time you doubled over in laughter? Laughter decreases stress hormones that reduce stress and lower blood pressure. In fact, just anticipating a good laugh can help to reduce your overall stress levels.

Some people avoid smiling because they don't like their teeth, but even a genuine close-lipped smile on a normal face is more attractive than a blank stare or a glaring model with perfect features. Think about how wonderful a face that is shining with laughter looks. It doesn't matter if you laugh like a hyena or snort like a pig (like me), laughter enhances your beauty. Rent your favorite movies or