

regimen of eight medications to three, and found myself feeling better, looking better, and experiencing none of the previous side effects that I had been plagued with.

Obviously, you should consult your doctor before changing your diet or medications, but don't be afraid to push your doctor to help you find ways around taking more medicine; on the flip side, be sure to listen to what your doctor tells you. If s/he tells you to lose weight or change your diet to avoid taking cholesterol medication, you had better take the advice seriously rather than simply continuing on as always.

So, you might be asking—I'll be better looking if I stop taking so much ibuprofen, drink more water, and laugh uproariously while drinking champagne and having sex in the sunshine?

Well . . . yes. But don't quote me on the outdoor sex part.

4 Ways to Dress for Success and Still Spend Less

Ladies, are any of you out there like me? I hate buying clothes for work because I know that work is the only place I'll wear them. They aren't particularly comfortable, and they certainly aren't my style outside of the office. On top of that, work clothes tend to cost more than any other clothes I buy. In fact, sometimes I feel like I should get an extra stipend just because I have to buy an entirely separate wardrobe full of clothes I would never otherwise choose to wear so that I can be presentable at the office.

Over the years, I've learned how to stretch my money when it comes to buying work clothes, so I can spend more of it on things I really want. Here are some of my ideas.
