

Here are a few options:

- Subscribe to only the most basic channels, at least for a few months until you get your finances back on track. Who knows, you might find you don't miss those extras too much after all!
- Get rid of your DVR. If you're renting a DVR from the cable or satellite company, think about buying one of your own (the cost will pay for itself over time), or get rid of it entirely.
- Supplement with TV network apps and internet access. Many popular channels (NBC, CBS, FOX, PBS, The CW, etc.) offer series episodes for free on their respective websites or apps, usually the day after they air. The catch? They often limit their selection to only show the last few episodes. This is really useful though if you only watch a few shows and actively keep up after each release.
- Catch up on past seasons from the library. They might not have every TV show available, but you might find a new favorite while browsing the selection!
- Buy an episode or season pass from iTunes or Amazon. At $1.99-$2.99 per episode this has the potential to be expensive, but for a one-time thing, it could be cheaper than paying for cable.
- Buy an antenna to view local, over-the-air channels. Antennas usually cost somewhere between $25-$40, and you can find out which one you should buy, as well as what channels are available to access on AntennaWeb.org. Also, if you live in an urban area and own a Smart TV, an antenna may already be built into your device.

3. SUBSCRIBE TO A STREAMING SERVICE

Alternative programs such as Netflix, Hulu, Amazon, and Sling TV, combined with a streaming device, allow you to watch all of your favorite