

- Ting is a pay-as-you-go plan that works in “buckets.” There are buckets of minutes, texting, and data, and you pay depending on how much you use. There is also a monthly device fee and it runs through the Sprint network.
- Republic Wireless also runs through the Sprint network, and works similarly to Ting. The difference, however, is that Republic Wireless will refund you the difference of whatever data you paid for but didn’t use. They also don’t charge you for individual minutes; you get unlimited talk and text for a flat fee.

You might be wondering whether the coverage for each of these plans will be adequate for your area. Talk to friends and family members who have experience with them, and compare notes to see if they might work for you too. Many of these pay-as-you-go plans offer coverage maps and usage calculators on their website so you can be absolutely sure before you commit.