

Often when you take an emergency (or even planned) trip to the hospital, you leave with a ton of paperwork. There are bills from the doctor, the hospital, anesthesiologist (if you needed one), lab work, and any other tests that were done. It can get out of hand rather quickly!

Keep a file of all the medical bills and insurance claim paperwork you receive, and group them based on each medical-specific visit. This is extremely helpful in case you need to reference something later, and has actually saved us money. We avoided an anesthesiologist payment because the hospital billed it to our insurance too late, and we were able to prove this via the paperwork we had neatly filed away.