

more than plenty. In fact, most shampoos are so highly concentrated that you can actually water them down, and still get all the benefits.

For those who like to experiment with homemade products, take five minutes to browse Pinterest and collect an assortment of make-your-own recipes. There's homemade shampoo, detangler, hair gel, hair masks, even styling cream, and all use natural ingredients that are free of harmful toxins and are most likely already inside your pantry. Your hair might need a bit of an adjustment period since it will likely react to the lack of chemicals, but this is completely normal. It should go back to "playing nice" after a week or two, and can be much healthier long-term.

Also, just like we talked about in the makeup chapter, don't be afraid to cut off tops and dispensers to get an extra shampoo or styling application out of the bottle after you "think" you're done with it. The amount of product left inside can usually get you through two or three more treatments!
