

go through such extremes to save a few bucks. Just take a quick peek at Coupons.com to see what's available, and only print coupons on items you already buy.

Then it's time to stock up.

And no, I don't mean fill your closets and cabinets with fifty packages of toothpaste, but sales are cyclical so you can expect to see them again every six to eight weeks. Plan accordingly and buy enough to get you through to the next sale.

2. BUY ONLINE

I don't always think about Amazon as the place to purchase toiletries, but a closer look reveals that it's a top competitor not to be ignored. And of course, why wouldn't it be? Amazon sells practically everything!

For example:

The deodorant I use is usually between $3-$4 per stick at the regular store. But on Amazon, I can buy a pack of 4 for just $7.98, making them $1.99 each. That's almost a 50% savings!

There is also a Prime Pantry option for those who are Amazon Prime members. How it works is you fill a box with as many Prime Pantry items as you need (this includes other household and grocery items in addition to toiletries), and it ships for $5.99 per box no matter how many products you put inside. This service is geared towards those who prefer to buy single-package options at regular price, rather than buy each item in bulk.

Another perk of Amazon is the ability to use their version of coupons. All you have to do is click on "Today's Deals" right underneath the search bar, and it will bring up another navigation bar on the next page. Look for the "Coupons" category and click on that to bring up hundreds of dollars worth of savings. The best part is they only require one little click, and that coupon is automatically applied to your shopping cart!
