

4. BUY ONLINE

In just the past few years, buying clothes online (even used ones!) has become really popular and changed the face of online shopping.

ThredUp.com and Schoola.com offer services where you can buy and sell your clothes straight from their website, and they always have huge discounts up to 90% off. I have shopped at ThredUp multiple times, and have always been pleased with the prices and quality. If you'd like to try ThredUp for yourself, you can get $10 to spend by using my referral link:

CreativeSavingsBlog.com/ThredUp

Outside of used clothing, you can also buy brand new items for just as great a deal, if not better, simply by shopping online. While regular sales from the retailer are awesome in themselves, you should also check RetailMeNot.com for coupon codes before submitting the virtual checkout button. Combine the coupon with Ebates.com, and you'll also get cash back!

Don't forget to sign up for your favorite retail store email lists to receive discount codes every month (and around your birthday). Even better, if you leave your online shopping cart full for a few days, the retailer will most likely email you a coupon as an incentive to come back and check out.

5. HOST A CLOTHING SWAP

I have to admit that I've never done a clothing swap before, but this is something I would love to do with my friends in the very near future! There are so many times I feel plain icky or "blah" about my own clothes, even though they would look perfectly acceptable on someone else.

Hosting a party with your friends is the perfect excuse for everyone to declutter their closets and bring clothes they aren't thrilled about wearing anymore, and lets them select a few new pieces without buying new at the store. Make sure you invite women of all shapes and sizes and have everyone drop off their clothes at least a week before the swap so you can get set up and organize clothing by size and category.