

favorite. Also, don't completely disregard store brands until you've tried them. Many times, they're the same quality ingredients as bigger brands, but packaged in a different, less expensive way.

The last thing is to always measure your cleaning products, or at least not use as much. For example, most makers of laundry detergent count on consumers filling the entire cap with liquid, even though the directions on the back call for much less. This wastes the product, and in turn, encourages you to buy more. I actually kept track of one full container of detergent from beginning to end, using the proper amount, and squeezed out significantly more loads than what was promised on the label!
