

this habit is hard to break! But you end up not only wasting more paper, you also create unnecessary paper clutter that is overwhelming to deal with when it's spread all over your desk and stacked in piles on the floor.

Evernote is my lifesaver for housing most everything in a paperless setting. I talk a lot more about Evernote and two resources I recommend reading if you're just getting started at

CreativeSavingsBlog.com/OrganizeMyLife

On the flip side, when you do have to print out something and you don't need to reference the information anymore, place the paper in a pile that you deem "scrap printer paper." I use my scrap pile to print coupons, my weekly meal plan, and anything else that doesn't require a professional printing.

For smaller pieces of paper, cut your scrap pile into quarters and keep as a stack on your desk to use whenever you need to write a to-do list or quick note. I also use the top half of cards I receive in the mail. This is one of my favorite ways to repurpose handwritten notes that I don't need to keep. It gives each card a second life, plus I always have a cute image on the back of my notes!

READER TIP:

I just bought an HP printer through Best Buy and they have a new program where you pay $2.99 a month for fifty pages per month (with rollover) and they send you new ink. You can do higher ones too depending on what you print. I figure for $36 a year, that's cheaper than one cartridge.

—Jenna, VT

2. SAVE ON INK

Whether you have an inkjet printer or a laser one, the cartridges inside can cost a pretty penny. For our color laser printer, we pay $60-$80 per