

into a nearby machine. Soon it was flashed on the television set above us: 10,000s HOL, $57\frac{7}{8}$.

Again I hadn't seen a thing, except the recorder in the gray jacket and the price on the television screen. It began to dawn on me that lingering on the trading floor and hanging around a specialist wasn't a good way to pick my next stock. Though Mr. Gollner patiently explained how the buyer approaches the specialist at the post, how the offer is made, how the specialist responds, and how the order is recorded, I still couldn't tell who was selling what to whom. Blocks of thousands of shares were moved on wiggles, blinks, mumbles, stares, and hand signals, flashed quicker than the common eye could follow. Mr. Gollner said this was a calm day.

Anxious to return to the futures, Mr. Gollner escorted me back through the corridor and deposited me at the guard station where I'd come in. I gave back the coat and tie and headed for the street, more befuddled than ever.
