

informed; and (5) they may be the first to know when to buy and when to sell a stock.

This latter point was very exciting and made me sorry that I hadn't learned any of this earlier. It was a good thing Mr. Hayes thought to include me, because the day after the meeting, I returned to the visitor's gallery at the New York Stock Exchange and got a powerful urge to dump Angstrom once and for all.

The Dow Jones industrial average was up 41 points that afternoon. It was up more than 300 points since I started my journey—a fact I'd been trying to ignore. Worse than losing money in a bad market is losing it in this greatest bull market in history, as some had already called it. My frustration was shared by other investors swearing at the Quotrons in the visitor's gallery. I met several who'd bought small over-the-counter stocks that hadn't moved up with the broad market. They, too, were threatening to sell.

At about 3:00 P.M. I began a frantic search for a public phone. I rushed around the visitor's gallery, checking the hallway and the bathrooms, but there was no phone in sight. A guide who must have thought I was having a nervous breakdown suggested I take the next elevator to the downstairs lobby. There was no phone in the lobby, either. In this way, the New York Stock Exchange resembles a racetrack, where they aren't allowed to install public telephones within so many hundred yards of the finish line.

Outside, I ran past Anatoli and the other candy vendors shivering in the March winds. I tried a couple of open-air phones down the street, but the buttons stuck in the cold, and I'd have gotten frostbite completing the numbers. A heat-seeking instinct led me into the service entrance at 50 Wall Street and from there into a rear hallway. There were some laundry carts filled with trash. It turned out to be computer printouts and other refuse from Drexel Burnham Lambert. Their New York headquarters must have been directly upstairs.

In a corner of the hallway of Drexel's building was a phone booth.

As I picked up the receiver and started to dial Ms. Garrett, I was overcome with conflicting emotions. First, I felt guilty for calling my Prudential-Bache broker from the very headquarters of
