

was prepared to go out and invest my remaining capital on Holiday Inn options, before I stopped off in the bathroom of the Z. B. Troutman lobby. There I heard two well-dressed employees discussing the "Bally takeover." Believing that information gained in the bathroom would prove more valuable than what I'd gotten from a regular interview in the office, I immediately lost interest in Holiday Inn, and decided in favor of Bally. It was just this sort of accidental hint that I'd hoped to get from Mr. Boesky's office, something that occurred naturally in the speculative habitat. I called my new discount broker and bought 10 Bally May 22½ call options. This cost me $2,426.44 and left me with only $800 in cash from my original stake.
