

end. It seemed that the technicians and chart readers saw this collapse better than the fundamentalists.

Martin Zweig, a well-respected student of the market and author of the popular Winning on Wall Street, also sold stocks and went into cash, at just the right moment.

I tried to call my friend Orton at his risk arbitrage office, but he never returned the call, and the news that his particular firm lost $44 million in a single week gave me the idea he might not be in the mood for conversation.

Daniel Gressel, the futures trader with whom I spent a delightful evening trying to figure out whether he'd won or lost, had moved to Hong Kong, where his wife, Claudia, worked in the bureau of The Wall Street Journal. Knowing that the entire Hong Kong Exchange had been temporarily closed, with millions of dollars in outstanding futures contracts in jeopardy, I feared the worst for Mr. Gressel, but his wife informed me that he had taken a job with a British investment management firm. As to his own trading results, "He's still living" was her only comment.

The computer at Battery March Financial in Boston had apparently beaten out most of the competition from the rival firms with the hundreds of paid analysts. Dean LeBaron told me that the computer had outperformed the S&P index by a "couple of percentage points" for the entire year, and that even in the Crash the Battery March fortunes had gone down a few points less than the market as a whole. This was a small but meaningful consolation.

The only real winners in a 508-point drop were the short sellers. Dump 'Em Jim Chanos admitted that "life had been pretty grim" during the entire year and a half of bullishness, but now that everybody else was grim, it was his turn to be happy. "I don't want to quantify things," he said, "but I'm doing just fine. I'm still net short, by the way. I think the bull market is dead."

If only—one imagines—one had sold all stocks on the most recent words out of the mouth of the economist Henry Kaufman. A few days prior to the Crash, on October 9, in fact, Mr. Kaufman made front-page news with a sanguine assertion that veteran Kaufman-watchers should have known was a sure sign of imminent fatality:
