

keting. He was convinced that with his help—which wasn't free—all of us could do the same.

If you ask me, the most inspiring of all the late-night millionaires was Dave Del Dotto. His program was broadcast from the balcony of a Hawaiian condominium, overlooking the Pacific ocean. Mr. Del Dotto explained that from boyhood he'd carried a picture of Hawaii in his pocket, and this picture inspired him to get rich and move to the island paradise, though there was some confusion as to his permanent whereabouts. In one program, he said he lived in Hawaii while in another he claimed to visit the place as much as possible. Hopefully, he'll clear this up.

In his striped leisure shirt and cotton deck trousers, with two pinky rings and a gold watch for each arm, Mr. Del Dotto looked as if he'd be just as comfortable in Reno, Nevada, as he was on the Hawaiian waterfront. Among his several money-making mottoes, the most memorable were "From My Impossible Dream to Yours," "Don't Be a Floater," and "Consider the Ends First"—the latter an alleged quotation from Leonardo Da Vinci, though I couldn't find it in any of my reference books.

To assist the general public, Mr. Del Dotto devised a comprehensive home-study course with books and tapes that more or less covered everything offered by his late-night competitors, including a cash-flow system, how to buy foreclosed real estate, how to get more credit cards, equity sharing, creative finance, tax-sale land, and the like, all in one package. As a bonus, there was a special certificate for a vacation to Hawaii, complete with sunset cruise and Polynesian cruise, plus the most favorable airline and hotel rates offered through Mr. Del Dotto's personal travel agent. The entire home-study course cost only $289, and for this low price you'd get $1,475 worth of information, not including the vacation.

Though I didn't rush to send in my $289—in fact, I carelessly forgot the 800 number and lost Mr. Del Dotto's address—I learned a great deal from watching his broadcasts. I learned that Mr. Del Dotto's having been a C student in high school, which resulted in his using words like analization when he meant to say analysis, hadn't stopped him from getting rich. Among his followers was a blind boy named Chad Hazen who'd listened to the tapes and
