

followed the plan, and in spite of his handicap, he, too, had gotten rich. Then there was the “little black lady from Chicago”—recently destitute and unable to feed her family—who now controlled some valuable downtown real estate.

Mr. Del Dotto couldn’t overemphasize the point that before you can get richer you have to want to get richer. In fact, that was the universal conviction of all the late-night financial advisors I’d tuned in during the week.

If I needed further convincing that my old beliefs were ill-conceived and impediments to success, Mr. Del Dotto did the job. After I watched him a few times on TV, all my “money isn’t everything” notions were exorcised. Without hesitation, I was able to swear that I envied Mr. Del Dotto’s position and would like to be just as rich as he is. Such an admission was necessary to any further progress, and it brought me to my Second Useful Tip:

People who think that money isn’t everything will never have enough
