

stocks had been hoisted to ridiculous levels by the momentum players and were probably still expensive even at 50 percent mark-downs. But some good, reasonably priced companies quickly became unreasonably cheap companies. When the hysteria subsided, their stocks climbed back up.

Note that we want the sound banks and good companies. When an industry gets bombed, you can't pick indiscriminately from the rubble. But research will usually turn up some legitimate bargains. Then all it takes is patience.
