on the basis of shares already owned. A record 22 such offerings took place in 1993, and the trend has continued. According to an article, the reason fund managers want more money (besides to earn higher fees) is that they can't "pass up" all the new stuff they want to buy. Institutions are also becoming increasingly involved in derivatives (i.e., securities that are created from other securities to increase leverage). Eastman Kodak's pension fund made the first
