

possible worlds for stocks. The upside potential in the market then was truly great. From 1979 to 1983, during the resolution of a sixteen year trading range, The Elliott Wave Theorist hammered home this point at a time when few would listen:

We are exiting a period when well-timed trading was the only key to profits in the blue chips. We are entering a period when “buy and hold” is again a sensible approach. And how many money managers would dare utter that phrase after the pummeling of the last thirteen years? — August 3, 1979

This bull market should be the first “buy-and-hold” market since the 1960s. The experience of the last sixteen years has turned us all into traders, and it is a habit that will have to be abandoned. — October 6, 1982

Legions of brilliant short term traders who have been weaned on the jerky markets of the past few years are not psychologically prepared for the first real bull market in 20 years. By the time the public gets into this game, the speculation will be wild. If you’re a professional, it will be the easiest money you have ever made. If you’re not, try to think like one. It may sound easy now, but it will be tough not losing your perspective when this market is boiling into its final peak. — November 8, 1982

Large institutions will probably do best by avoiding a market timing strategy and concentrating on stock selection, remaining heavily invested until a full five waves of Primary degree can be counted. — April 6, 1983

Would it have been possible to anticipate investors’ switch to a full embrace of this approach at the ultimate top of the market? In fact, that is exactly what The Elliott Wave Theorist did. The June 1985 issue prepared readers for the eventual extension of time horizon by the majority of investors:

The professionals’ focus on the near term, as Robert Farrell of Merrill Lynch has pointed out, is becoming increasingly obsessive and myopic. On Friday, a major national newspaper quoted an optimistic broker as saying, “you might soon see the start of a 10-15 point rally.” What kind of perspective is that?! More and more often, both the media’s and industry’s focus is not the next two years, but the next two hours (or more accurately, the last
