

grees, and the media will reflect and support the widespread fear. Government spokesmen will finally admit the severity of conditions. At that point, not only will it be far too late to take protective measures, it will be time to turn bullish.

The good news is that despite their extreme depths, depressions are relatively swift events compared to the booms that characterize the long periods between them. If you are positioned properly, the downdraft need not hurt you, and the next upswing will, for its duration, return the world to "normal." You can employ the Wave Principle to recognize the turning point a few years hence. If you arrange your business affairs to be properly positioned for the upturn, you can place yourself in the extreme minority of people who will be charting the course of future business empires, and build your fortune.
