

cruciatingly difficult for most people to assert in socially charged situations, because the effects of the patterns are so pervasive and powerful. Hope, fear, denial and inertia are all part of the process. A general and deep disbelief that anything like the outlook presented in this book will occur, for example, is a requirement for it to happen. Nevertheless, farsighted and motivated individuals need not fall into the pattern. Once the Wave Principle is understood, social dynamics can in fact be used to your advantage. Every age includes some people who discern a major change in trend well enough in advance to prepare, lead and thrive. You might as well be one of them. If you act in time, you can put yourself in a position to observe the crowd and avoid or even profit from its excesses rather than become a part of it.

The quote that begins this chapter is spoken by Brutus in Act IV, Scene 3 of Julius Caesar, to which Cassius replies, "Then, with your will, go on." Go on we shall.

"Watch it. Mr. Prechter is on the warpath."
