that coins are in the fifth wave up from the 1982 low. The risk in this market now due to cyclic forces in commodity prices, inflation/deflation and the economy is tremendous and increasing. A loss of 50%-90% would not be out of line. Consider that a 75% decline would merely bring coin prices back to where they were when the gold price first achieved $350/oz. [its current price] in 1979.

There are times when action is so prudent that it must be encouraged. Any investor overly weighted in collector coins should strongly consider selling his collection at today's lofty prices. If you're truly a collector, you should delay your purchases for two to three years. This is only one analyst's opinion, of course; the final decision is up to you.

That analysis was expanded a bit for an article that was eventually published in the August 1, 1990 issue of Coin World magazine. It included this additional observation on the state of upside momentum in the coin market:

Supporting the case that the bull market for collector coins is ending is recent "internal" market action. It is classic behavior at an overall market peak for segments of a market to begin moving counter to the previous trend, while others continue in the prior

As presented by Robert Prechter in Coin World; data through June 1990

CHART REVEALS trend of lower grade coins diverging from higher grade coins in the last year.

Figure 19-2