

"Thank you, Bob. I think we get the picture."

destroy more lives than all prior wars. The conclusion of this trend of events and social mood will set the base for the next advance, which will produce another glorious period of economic expansion, social well-being, beneficial technological innovation, political freedom, peace, and philosophical and spiritual progress.

THE AFTERMATH

When the king asked the royal philosopher to provide him with a motto that would serve under every circumstance, whether wonderful or devastating, the philosopher, after some thought, replied, "This, too, shall pass." Rough times, like good times, recur, but they always end. Measured, recurring corrections of prior trends are part of the natural fractal order of things; they have a purpose and are good, or they would not exist. Because human progress takes place in a "three steps forward, two steps back" manner, it is clear that the "two steps back" are required to put psychology and motivation in a condition to support the next geometric rise in material, social
