

So far, however, the 1990s have diverged completely from the typical profile, rising in the "1", "2" and "3" years and going sideways in the "4" year. One reason might be the renewed popularity of the pattern. The Decennial Pattern has recently enjoyed some publicity, primarily because it calls for powerful gains throughout 1995, 1996 and most of 1997. However, the divergence from the norm in the past four years places the generally expected outcome powerfully in doubt. With so many cycles pointing lower, this cycle is at risk of failure. The strongest correlation of the Decennial Pattern with other cycles discussed in this appendix is in the low due in the "2" through "4" years of the next decade, when so many other cycles are due to bottom.
