

Probation period

The probation period is typically a period of 3 to 6 months during which the performance of a new employee is monitored. If an employee does not perform as per agreed expectations, then the employee may be offboarded without any legal hassles.

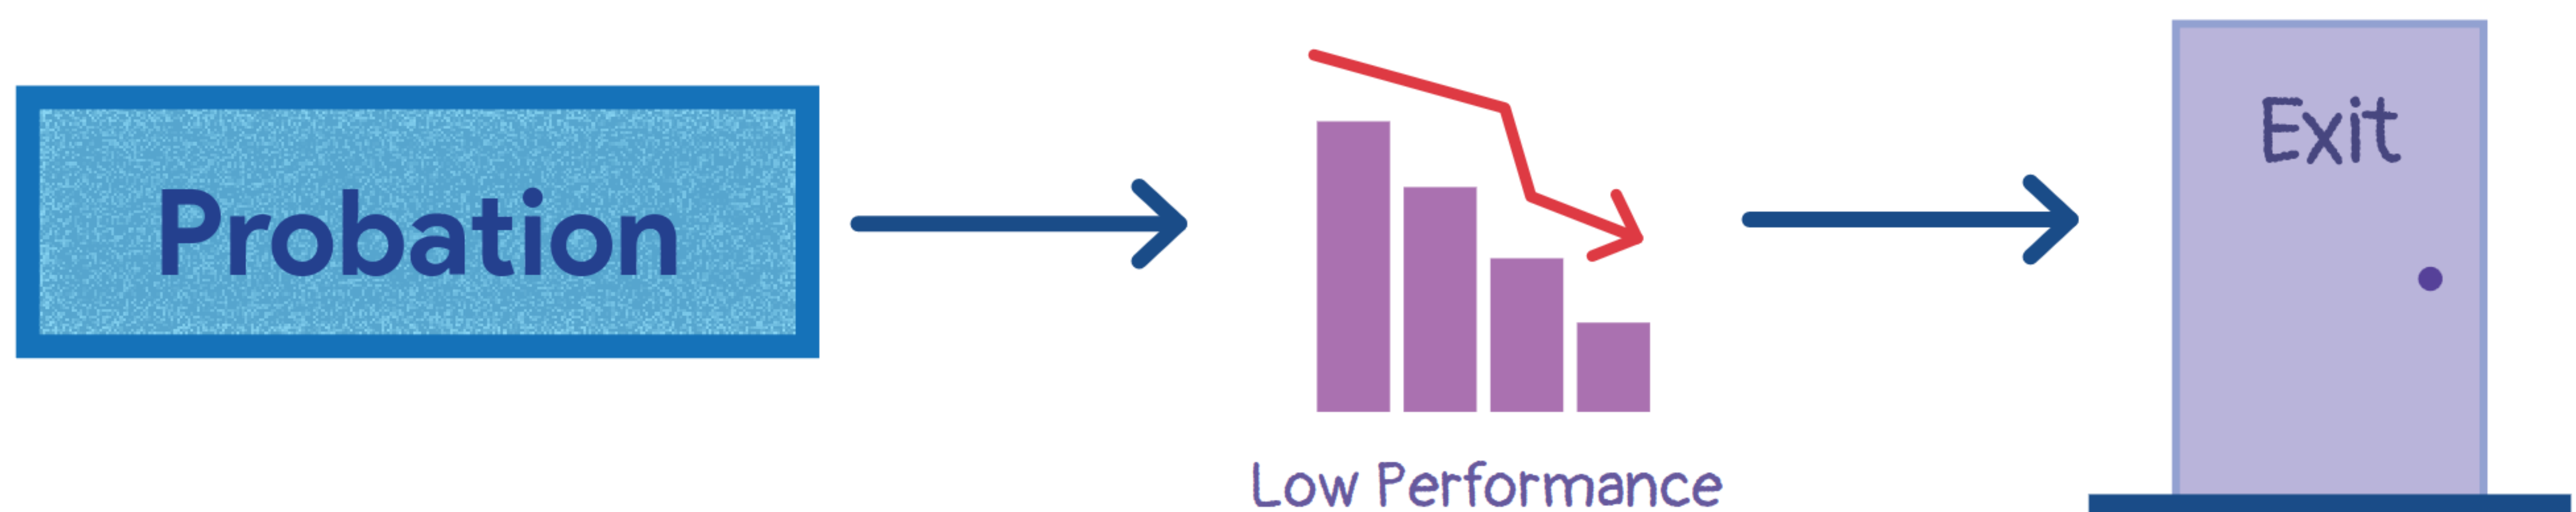

No Legal Hassle

Shorter Notice Period

The probation period is mentioned in the employment contract. The notice period is shorter during the probation period. Typically the employment contract can be terminated by giving 7 days' notice by the organization or the employee. Some organizations keep the notice period under probation period up to 30 days.

5. Evaluation and Confirmation

Before takeoff, air hostesses check that everyone has fastened the seat belts. Phone and electronic devices are switched off. The seat is in an upright position. Feedback is provided if expectations are not met. The failure to adhere to the feedback leads to consequences or confirmation. In a similar manner, the evaluation is conducted, and feedback is given. The people who work on the feedback and comply with the standards are confirmed as regular employees. The notice period of the confirmed employees is longer than that of the people under probation period (probationers). The people who do not meet the expectations are offboarded.

Practical Tip – If an employee is not evaluated and confirmed in the defined time frame. Then the employee is deemed confirmed. Suppose you decide not to confirm an employee. Then, you must terminate the contract or extend the probation period before the confirmation date. The probation period can be extended for 3 to 6 months.