

Practical Tip: The accumulation of leaves creates a future liability for the business. Hence, it is a good practice to encourage employees to mandatorily take at least half of their granted paid leaves. Another way to limit liability is by capping the total accumulation of paid leaves.

Optional Leaves

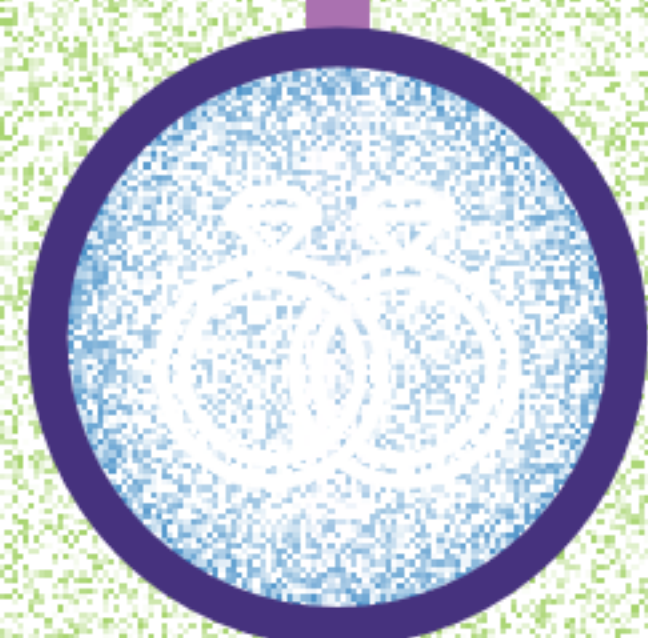

There are some leaves which you may offer to employees to support their genuine needs. There are some popular leaves which are granted by organizations based on the demographics and the needs of their employees.

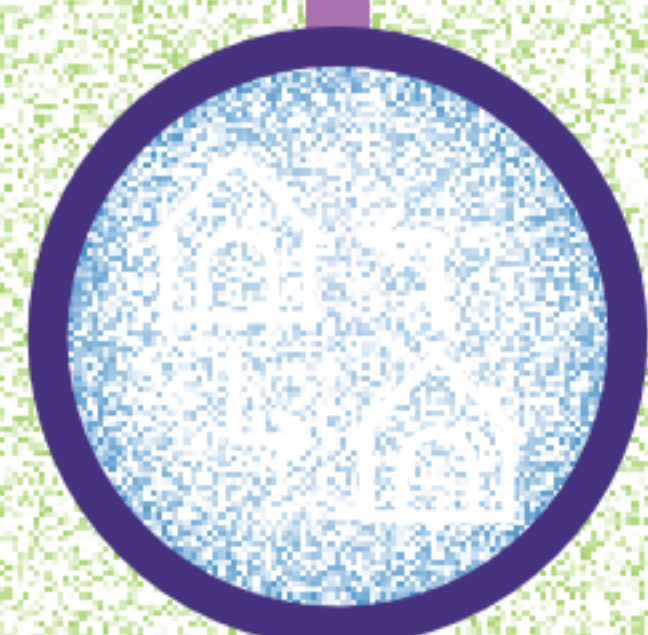

Bereavement Leave - for the death of an immediate family member. It is important to define family (Father, Mother, Spouse and Children) to avoid misuse.

Paternity Leave - for expectant fathers after the child birth.

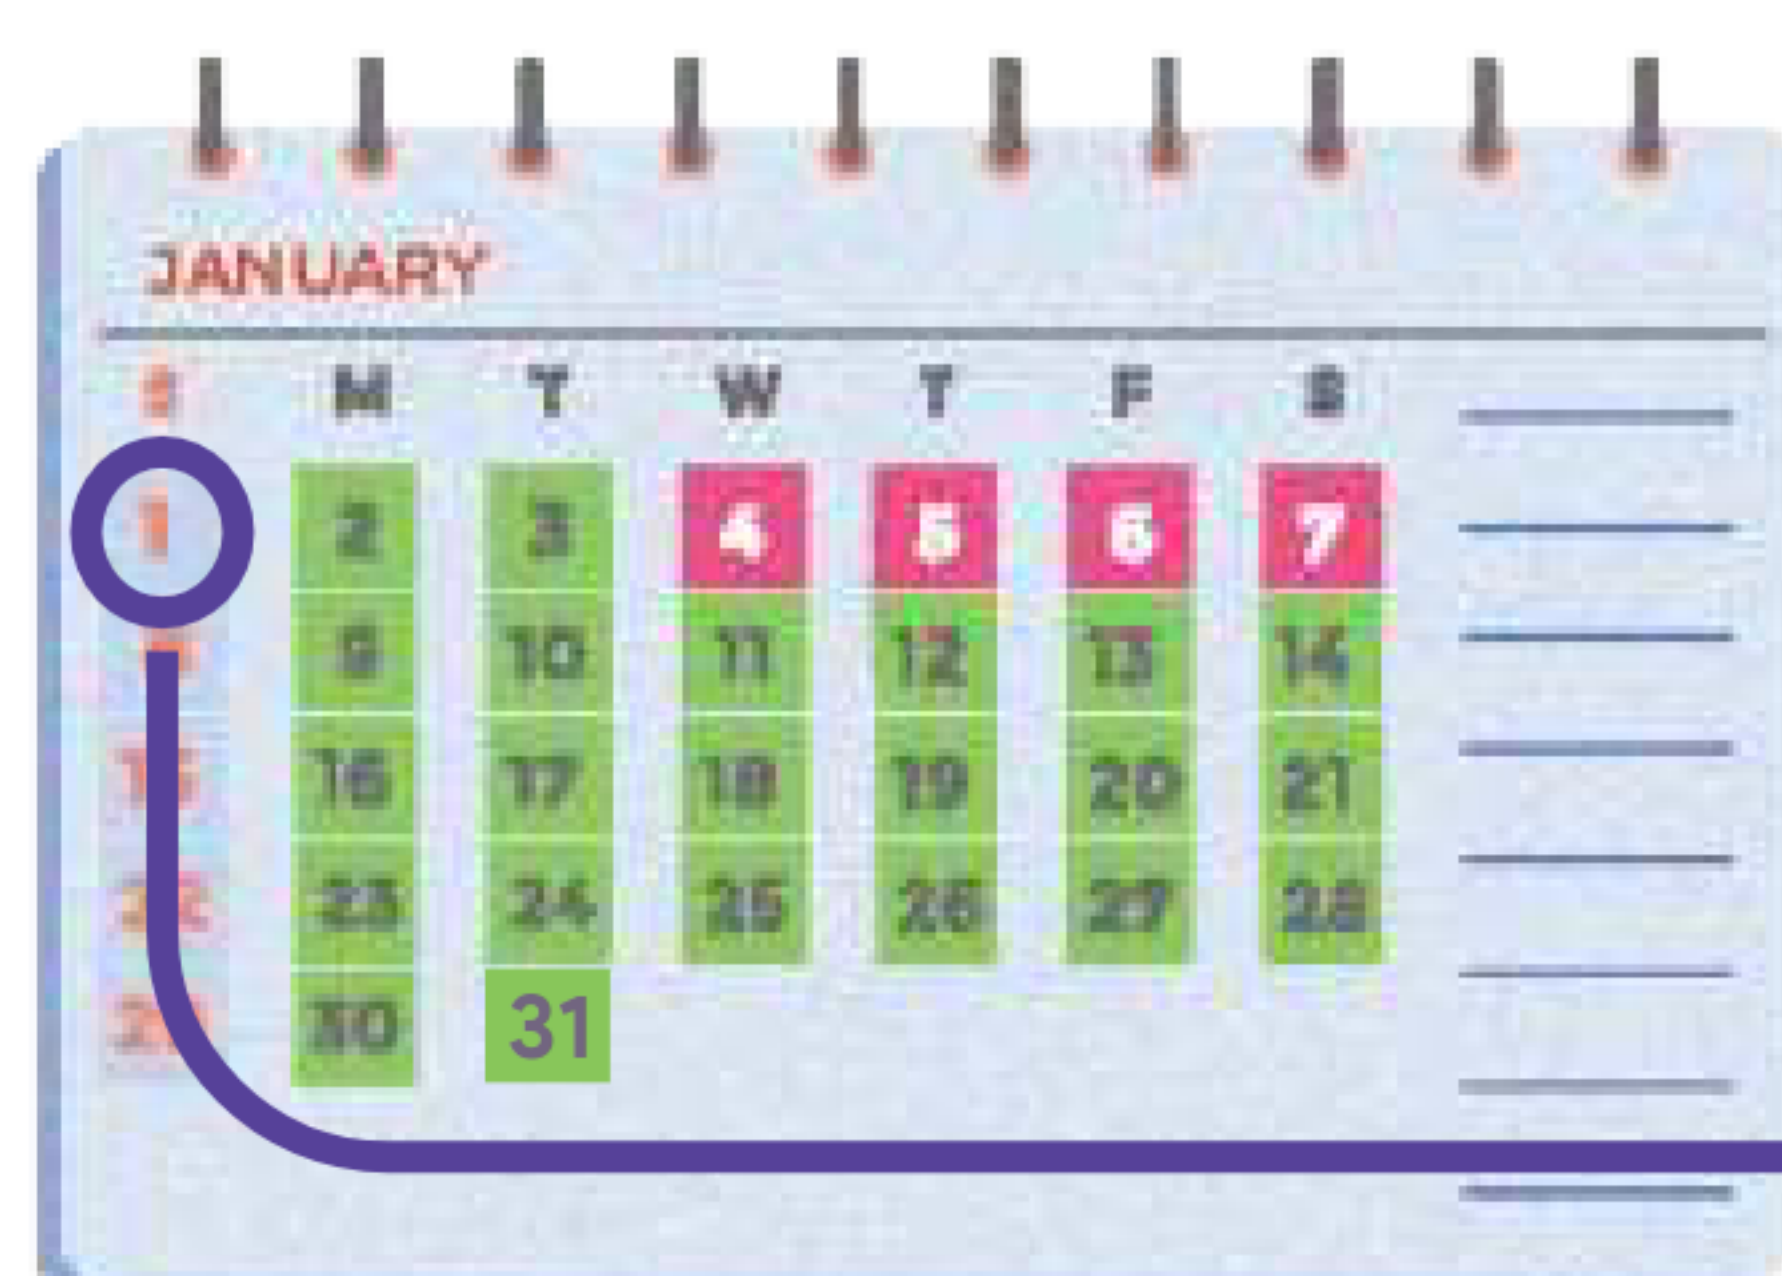

Marriage Leave - for single employees to get married.

Relocation Leave - for employees who are relocating on transfer or joining.

There can be many more leaves that can be created based on the needs of the employee. These needs are neither accumulated or encashed. You may define eligibility criteria for availing these leaves. You may credit them to the employee when the need arises.

Leave Crediting

January → December

Most of the organizations follow a calendar year (January to December) for crediting leaves. The leaves are credited on the first day of the calendar year. The credit is guided by your policy. There are three types of crediting.
