

In the End

The heart of the grievance management process is fairness. It encourages employees to express their genuine feelings and concerns openly. This not only mitigates operational risks but also reduces reputational risks. If you are listening then the employee refrain from publicly announcing problems on social media. Grievance management may appear to be a tool for resolving complaints, but it is actually a tool for promoting behavioral change.

There are other methods that can be used to bring about behavior change. We will discuss the methods in the next chapter.

Grievance management not only solves complaints but also changes behaviors.

Hands-on HR

Here are some hands-on questions for you to apply what you have learnt in this chapter.

1. Grievance Management System

Set up a Grievance Management system for a set of employees using any of the following Customer Relationship Management (CRM) tools.

- Zoho Desk (<https://www.zoho.com/desk/lp/customer-complaint-management-system.html>)
- Fresh Desk (<https://www.freshworks.com/freshdesk/sign-up-free/>)

2. Create a dipstick survey

Create a dipstick survey to check whether employees like the new canteen menu. You may use google forms for it. (<https://www.google.com/forms/about/>)

3. Conduct a Focused Group Discussion

Conduct a focused group discussion with an objective to understand whether moonlighting should be allowed in the organization or not.

- Prepare up to 10 open ended questions without a yes/no answer. E.g. What is moonlighting? Why would an employee want to do moonlighting? What are the risks? What should be allowed and what should not be?
- Complete the discussion in 45 to 60 minutes.
- Select a mixed group (gender, age, hierarchy) of people.
- Decide the location and time for discussion
- Moderate the discussion with a neutral stance.
- Summarize the discussion at the end.
