

3. The Product is Still at the MVP Stage

The MVP stage represents the early development phase of the product, during which the company might fail to deliver on its promises. Therefore, if the product doesn't fully deliver on its claims, it's likely because it is still in the development process.

Juicero has to be the perfect example to explain this. Juicero promised a sleek device that made cold-pressed juice using proprietary juice packages. Each package had a QR code providing detailed ingredient information, and the device required WiFi to check the package's best-by date.

➡ Juicero raised an impressive $118 million in funding, but the product was essentially still at the MVP stage.

➡ It is over-promised and under-delivered. Consumers quickly realised that they could squeeze the juice packets by hand without the expensive machine, rendering the device redundant.

Expectations

Expensive device juices the packet of chopped fruits and vegetables.

Reality

Consumers quickly realised that they could squeeze the juice packets by hands by making Juicero redundant.

Juicero's failure highlighted how clever advertising couldn't compensate for a product that wasn't fully ready for market demands.
