

How Consumers Purchase Different Types of Goods

Types of

Convenience Goods

Goods for everyday needs.
Purchased with minimal thinking.

Convenience goods are products that consumers purchase frequently and without much thought. These are items that meet everyday needs or desires and are readily available for purchase at convenient locations. Examples include gum, chips, toiletries, and basic household items.

Shopping Goods

Purchased only after comparing with other brands.

Features
Prices
Quality
Model

} Evaluated

Shopping goods are products that consumers purchase less frequently and typically spend little time thinking about before making a purchase. Examples include clothing, home decor, and more items. Consumers purchasing shopping goods often research options, compare features, evaluate prices and quality, and assess different brands or models.