

B. Bandwagon Effect

The bandwagon effect is a psychological aspect where people tend to adopt behaviours or beliefs because they see others doing the same, wanting to be part of an “in-group.” When people see a product or service labelled as a “best seller” or “most popular”, they believe that it is of high quality because they assume that many others have already chosen it.

Hence, people may be inclined to buy the product driven by the majority choice.

Many people started making Dalgona coffee after seeing it on social media. It quickly became a global trend, showing how the bandwagon effect works.

➡ Startups can similarly leverage this phenomenon by tapping into current trends or cultural moments or maybe creating such trends as Nike did with Air Jordans.

C. Centre Stage

It is a marketing strategy where the positioning of a product can impact a customer’s decision. If a product is placed in the centre of a display, highlighting it with a different colour draws attention and makes it stand out from other options.

When customers have multiple choices, they get attracted to the product that is visually different from the rest. In this way, marketers can influence customer behavior and make more sales.