

Create FOMO

Creating FOMO leverages consumers' fear of missing out to generate urgency and exclusivity, encouraging them to engage with a brand or product more actively.

Social media platforms are great tools to create FOMO by promoting products. Sharing content about your product, its features, benefits and experiences can create a buzz among your audience.

➡ Influencer marketing can also generate FOMO. When influencers endorse your product or share their experiences with their followers, people may feel like they're missing out on something.

For example, Dalgona coffee, became popular on Instagram thanks to influencers sharing videos and posts about how delicious and trendy it was. Hence, using social media marketing, you can create FOMO around your product, influencing people to purchase it.

Talking about your product in a press release or leveraging strong audience interactions can significantly boost visibility and generate leads or sales. This ensures your startup stays on the radar of journalists, bloggers, and influencers, who may mention it in articles, reviews, or posts.

Zomato, for example, has built a strong presence on social media, using quirky advertisements and an always-on approach to stay top-of-mind. Its practice of actively replying to user posts enhances engagement, strengthens customer relationships, and fosters long-term brand recall.
