

Marketing isn't static—it's an evolving experiment. Sometimes, the most unconventional strategies deliver the best results. Take Zomato's reverse psychology ad on Twitter with the tagline “Kabhi ghar ka khana bhi kha lo.” The playful approach encouraged people to cook at home, sparking conversations and, ironically, reinforcing Zomato's relevance in the food industry.

4.4 The Power of Branding

What is a brand, and why does everyone talk about it in business?

A brand is what makes you stand out from others. It's what makes your product unique and memorable. Your brand is more than just a logo or a product, it's also the impression and perception among people about your company.

A strong brand can influence customers to buy your products or services, making them more likely to choose you over competitors. It's like your company's personality—it shapes how people feel about your product. That's why brands are often the talk of the town in business discussions—because they have the power to make a lasting impact on customers and achieve success for companies.

While branding may seem superficial at first glance, it's actually much deeper and more important than just logos and colours. New brands are popping up everywhere on social media; to stand out among them, an attractive brand story is essential. It's not only what you sell but also the values, beliefs, and mission behind your brand that relate to your customers.

For example, many people get attracted to brands that advocate for causes or values that match their own, such as veganism or sustainability.
