

1.2 Is Launching a Startup the Right Path for You?

Consider the following reasons carefully. If your motivation aligns with any of these, it may indicate that you're not yet ready to build a startup. However, if you're prepared, ensure these reasons should not driving force behind your decision.

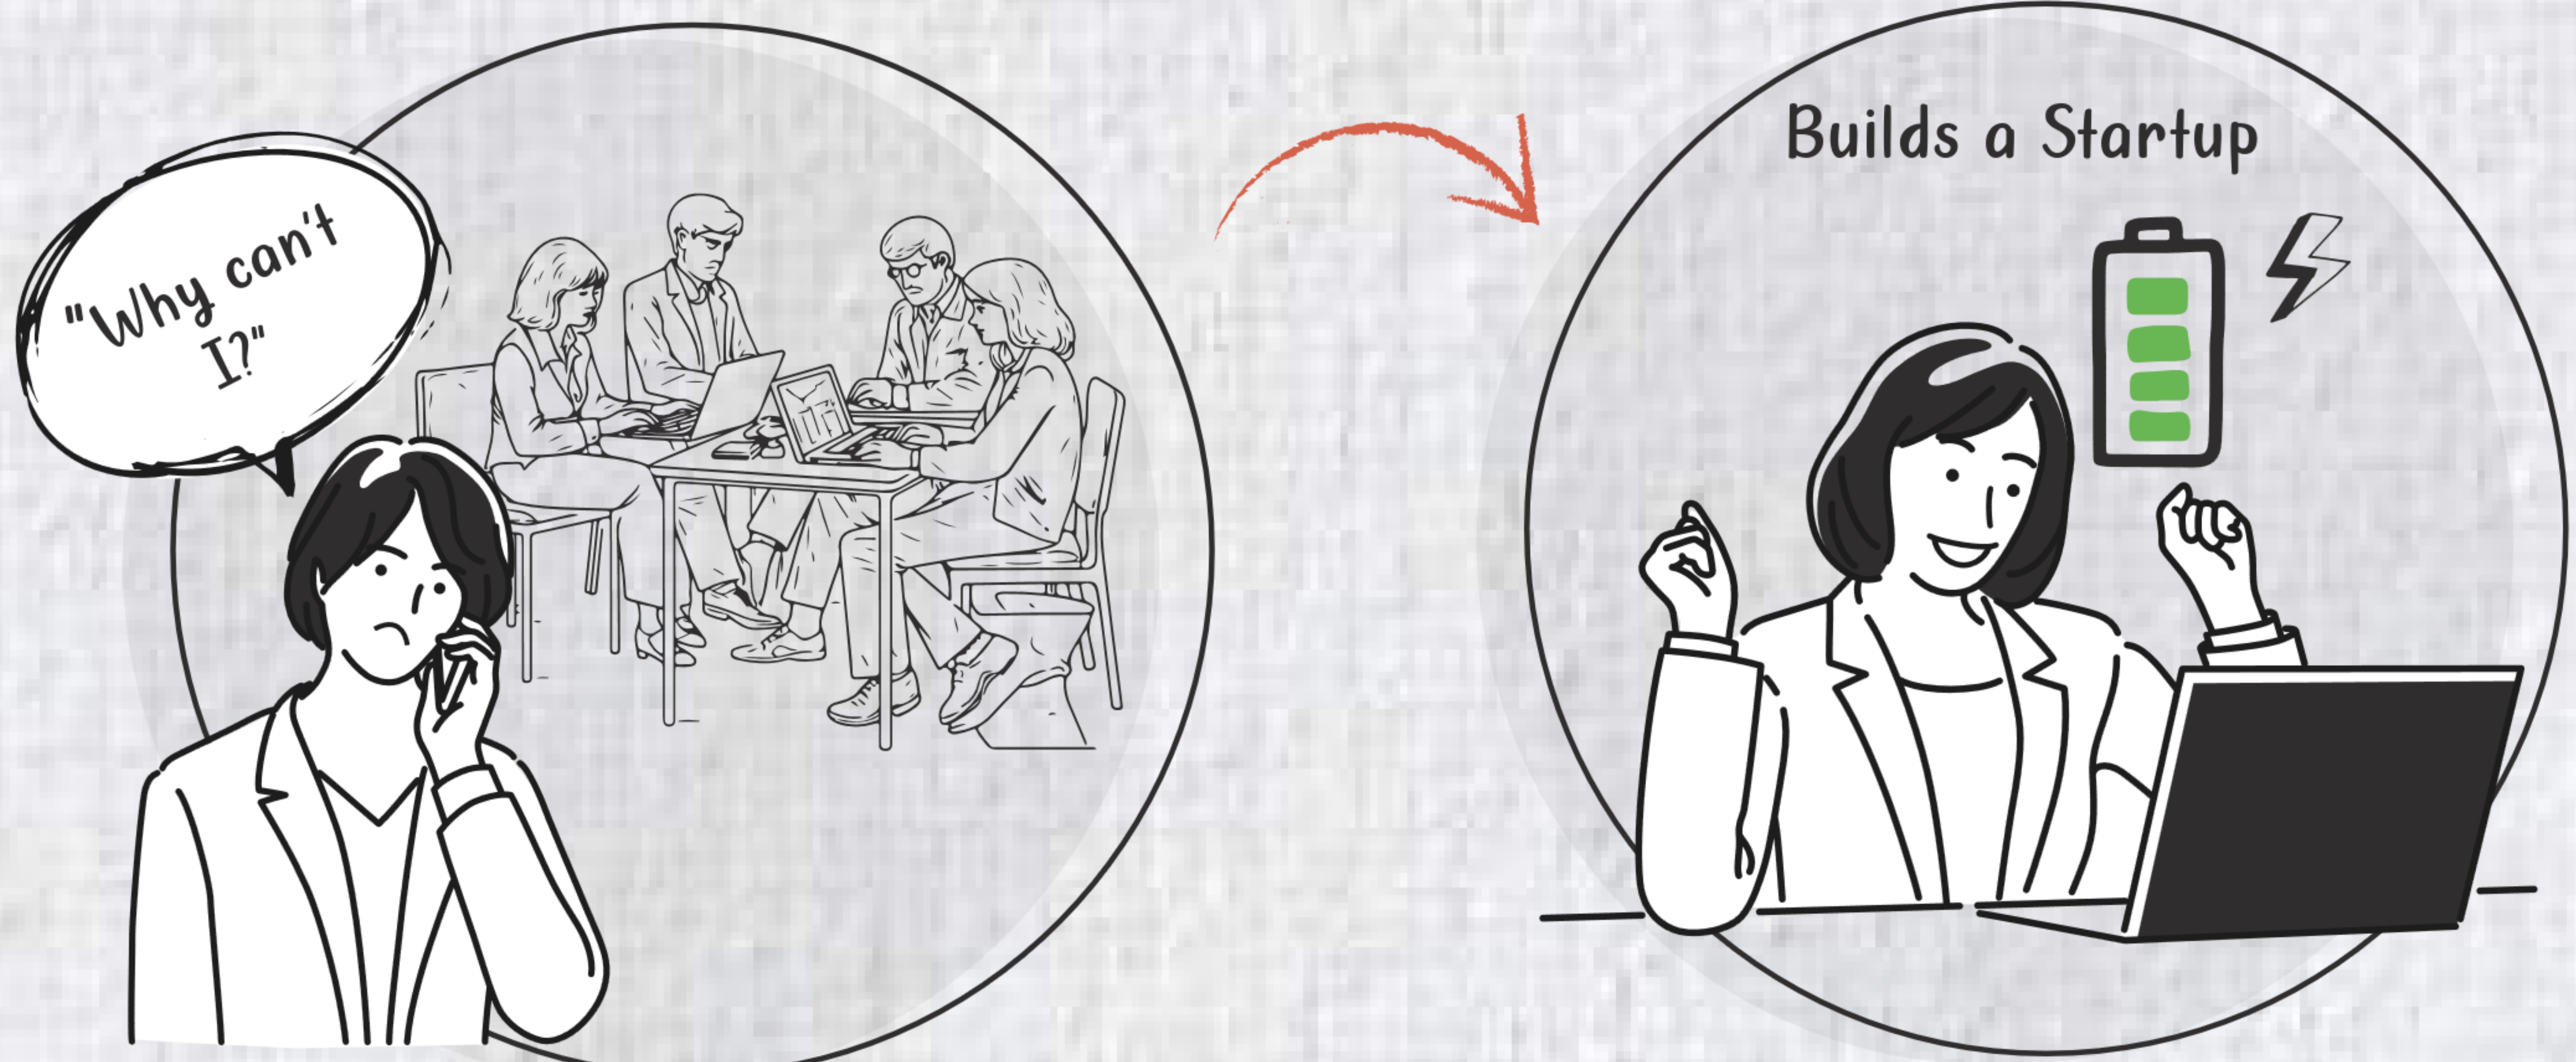

1. FOMO - The Fear of Missing Out

The Fear of Missing Out (FOMO) refers to feeling left out of what peers are doing. In today's world, many people own startups, and the same thought can occur to you that most people are building them; why can't I?

When driven by such a cause, the journey often becomes inconsistent. At times, you may feel encouraged by others taking a similar path, while at other times, motivation wanes. As a result, dedication suffers.

FOMO initially presents numerous opportunities to explore, but for most people, it offers only fleeting and surface-level motivation.

For Example

Imagine that you might see your friends starting businesses and feel compelled to do the same without considering the readiness or passion.

Initially, the excitement keeps you going, but as challenges arise, the lack of genuine motivation leads to struggles and setbacks.