

You realise that your motivation is only temporary. You may not have been truly prepared for the venture, and your FOMO-driven decision leads to struggles and setbacks. Starting a business to “keep up” is unsustainable. True success requires passion, preparation, and long-term commitment.

2. Escaping the 9-to-5

Starting a business just to avoid a 9-to-5 job isn't the best approach. If your main motivation is to quit your job or ditch a fixed schedule, entrepreneurship might not be the right path. Running a startup often requires more time, effort, and responsibility than a regular job. If this is your only reason, reconsider if entrepreneurship truly aligns with your goals.

If the goal is to escape fixed work hours and have better flexibility to work on personal terms, freelancing might be the best option.

Freelancing offers the freedom to choose the schedule, work based on the willingness and flexibility—without the intense demands of running a business.
